

What is Fair Housing

The Fair Housing Act was passed on April 11, 1968, just one week after the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. The law was born out of a need to provide housing access to all Americans, especially minorities such as African Americans and Hispanics, who, at the time, were prevented from purchasing or renting homes in certain areas due to their race or national origins.

The passage of the Fair Housing Act was a significant victory for American civil rights, and today it continues to protect people from discrimination when buying, renting, or selling a home. More specifically, the law prohibits discrimination from any party on the basis of race, color, national origin, religion, sex, familial status, or disability. In other words, when it comes to housing, no one can be treated differently based on their

National Earth Day April 22nd
"Invest in Our Planet"

"Spring cleaning isn't just about sorting through things, and getting rid of clutter. It's about taking stock of who you are, and how others see you. It's a chance to redefine yourself, to change expectations, and to remember that it's never too late to recapture who you were, or to aim for who you want to be."
